A STRANGE CHOICE

In the recent shakeup of our secret and dagger organization, the Central Intelligence Agency, some interesting facts have been published. It seems that the CIA's chief director and contact man with the Cubans involved in the unsuccessful invasion attempt, a top deputy in the CIA, had as his chief previous experience the teaching of economics at Yale University.

Perhaps there is a great deal that we do not understand in this. However, from the outside it makes a person wonder why a former Yale economics professor should be given control of a project which was strictly a military adventure.

The CIA director has since resigned from the third highest post in the agency. At any rate, it seems a somewhat strange choice in the Cuban matter. It is now water over the dam. But if we ever try it again, how about a military man from CIA.
